Robert Beers

Bonnie Fox

ENG-122-T4541

4/20/23

Project 2

Going back and looking at my past papers I have found that I am not as bad as I put myself out to be at writing papers. I have seen there are some areas that I need to focus on, for instance, I need to use more cited quotes when doing research, and I also need to spend more time proofreading to hopefully catch all of the errors in my spelling and sentence structures. During my next course English 123 I plan to bring everything I have learned in this course plus spend more time working to improve in the areas I was weak at. I will use all of my past papers as and reference point and may even use the library to have a tutor proofread my work. The feedback was very helpful to me as it motivated me to keep writing. The professor of the class always gave encouraging feedback and told you what areas you should work on.

While I was writing my essay, I chose to use fewer scientific terms and use something that was easy for anyone to understand. I did this to make the article more readable to the average person. I find it hard to read any paper that uses bigger words that I would have to spend time looking up to understand what they mean. The future of my writing is most likely going to be just writing my results to research for a supervisor to read. I am sure that some of my work could be published if it is seen as something that is warranted to be put in the scientific community. I do look forward to doing more research and hopefully discovering something that hasn’t been found before or maybe even a way to fix a bigger problem. While doing a research paper I would have to ask questions to get the audience’s attention. I would be asking them why it is not like this, do they believe there are any other alternatives, and what could we do better. I believe that questions keep an audience more focused on the reading.